Canada and the United States has proved the practicability of disarmament on the greatest of scales. All along the lengthiest international frontier in the world, more than 3000 miles between the Atlantic and the Pacific, there is no appreciable menace from the crowned republic of Canada or from the crownless republic of the United States.

But this solution of international relations through peaceful agreement is not the only case of Canada and America demonstrating the practicality and worth of arbitration. All differences between them about boundaries and fishing rights have been adjusted through diplomacy or arbitration. These disagreements have numbered some nine or ten, and on every occasion the two peoples have borne themselves honorably and the settlement has left no sting of international resentment. So satisfying has been the experience of Canada and America with their diplomats and arbitrators that the two nations have prepared for the future through the entering into an arrangement as unique as the century old truce of armaments. They have constituted an international commission on boundaries with the widest powers to deal with every issue between the people on that side and the people on this.

The settlement of the Newfoundland fisheries difficulty, though nominally between Great Britain and the United States, was really between Canada and America and the most important arbitration of modern times except that of the Alabama claims. It supplied the strongest evidence for the efficiency of the permanent court of arbitration at The Hague. It demonstrated again that at every apparent point of conflict between America and Canada have had men like Webster, MacDonald and Ashburn to take the large and peaceful view.—Spokesman Review.

It was only a couple of centuries ago that there began to appear a new phase of the apothecary's art, says Harper's Weekly. Confections began to be made more or less apart from any medicinal purpose and because people liked them, and eventually the confectioner's business became quite separate and distinct from that of the apothecary.

Although the confectioner's trade may be said to be about two hundred years old, it was only within recent times that it became a real and extensive industry. A first class confectioner heavily taxed and the confectioner's trade pursued upon very elementary principles. For a long time even the necessary ingredients were obtained from the most primitive sources. Sugar was obtained from the cane, and the necessary ingredients were obtained from the most primitive sources.

Although sugar is the predominant element in the manufacture of sweets, the secondary commodities, such as gum, gelatine, almonds, cocoanuts, walnuts, pistachio nuts, and other articles too numerous to mention, play no mean part in their production. Gum, the product of the acacia tree, which exudes it in tear-like drops, when melted and mixed with sugar becomes in the hands of the candy makers jubes and pastilles. Cocoanuts are used in immense quantities. Almonds, the flavoring of the French and Americans ground and mixed with sugar, form the well-known marzipan. In the Balkans and on the Riviera busy hands gather the flowers that scent the favorite bouquet lozenges and drops of the Europeans. The groves of Italy and Spain, Florida and California
